LAND BANK AMENDMENT

Vote in St. Louis Defeated It Along With Prohibition.

Jefferson City, Mo., Dec. 4.—A post mortem analysis of the recent vote on the Gardner land bank constitutional financing amendment, made by A. T. Edmonston, Secretary of the State Land Bank Committee, reveals, excluding the vote cast in St. Louis for and against the proposition, that it carried the State by 3,144 votes. Sixty-four counties voted for the measure and fifty against. The figures include St. Louis County which voted heavily negatively for practically no reason save that Republican voters prevail there and G. O. P. candidates fought the amendment bitterly for fear it would bring too much popularity and votes for its author, Frederick D. Gardner, Governor-elect of Missouri.

The total Missouri vote on the Land Bank Constitutional amendment, including the City of St. Louis, was 296,964 for and 346,443 against. St. Louis City voted 47,431 for and 100,054 against, the opposition there probably chiefly being due to the ignorance of the voters, who, in their anxiety to defeat state-wide prohibition, voted negatively on the three amendments before the electors, to scratch the one they were after.

Omitting St. Louis City, the 114 counties of the state, including Kansas City, St. Joseph, Springfield, Joplin and other smaller cities, the vote was 249,533 for the amendment and 246,389 against. For twenty counties which voted negatively a change of fifty votes the other way would have carried them for the proposition. Three fifths of the counties south of the Missouri river favored the Gardner Land Bank Act, and in north Missouri, where more prosperity prevails owing to a denser population and better development of the agricultural area and where a rural credit system is not so badly needed many counties which were considered indifferent to the amendment went heavily for it. All over Missouri where German farmers are numerous to the surprise of the advocates of the constitutional amendment, the vote was against it, undoubtedly due to the unreasonable and unwarranted attacks on it by Republican aspirants for political honor. Yet in Germany a similar system of rural credits has prevailed for many years and it has made that country financially what it is to-day. St. Louis, Franklin, Osage, Perry, Warren, Gasconade, Ste. Genevieve, Cape Girardeau, Cooper, Hickory and Monticau counties opposed the amendment, Jackson County, including Kansas City, voted 35,581 for the amendment and 27,282 against it, an affirmative verdict of 8,300. Jasper County gave 8,981 for and 6,647 against. Greene County also did the handsome thing, its voters casting 6,462 for it and 5,342 against. Other counties with handsome majorities were Boone, Butler, Cass, Clay, Crawford, Dallas, Dunklin, Harrison, Henry, Howard, Laclede, Lawrence, Linn, McDonald, Miller, Mississippi, Monroe, New Madrid, Newton, Nodaway, Oregon, Pike, Platte, Polk, Pulaski, Ralls, Randolph, St. Francois, Osage, Stoddard, Sullivan and Texas. Pettis County, the home of Judge Lamm, the Republican aspirant for Governor, who so vigorously assailed the Land Bank Act, only went 410 against it, the vote for being 3,417 and against 3,827.

Secretary Edmonston of the State Land Bank Committee closes his analysis of the amendment election result by stating that the returns from the rural sections indicate that if the proposition is submitted again in two years it will sweep Missouri. In 1918 Republican politicians cannot assert that it is a political measure and there may be no prohibition amendment submitted to the voters.

The St. Louis vote only defeated the amendment by 49,379. If the next General Assembly decides to open the ballot boxes there and make a general recount there may be enough votes unearthed, counted against the act but which were really cast for it, to put it over the plate. The fact that the vote generally, the state over, outside of the city of St. Louis was for the amendment save in a few heavy Republican counties, where it was made the target of political fire by G. O. P. leaders to defeat Governor-elect Gardner, emphatically indicates that the farmers of Missouri want a state rural credit system and will demand a joint concurrent resolution from the next General Assembly again submitting the proposition to be voted on at the election of 1918.

The Overturn in Ohio.

Ohio was the political marvel of the presidential election. Surrounded by States that voted for Hughes, she voted for Wilson. While states the Republicans had considered doubtful in previous elections went for Hughes, Ohio, which in previous elections had seldom been considered doubtful, went Democratic. Now the plurality has been officially announced, and the marvel increases. For Ohio not only went for Wilson, but gave him a larger vote than she had ever given any Presidential candidate, even Theodore Roosevelt in 1904, who got 600,095. Mr. Wilson this year got 604,946. His plurality was 90,110. Why should Ohio be a Democrat island in the stretch of States from the Atlantic to the Mississippi?

When the labor vote is mentioned it is objected that there is a labor vote in Illinois and Indiana, too. However, that is a superficial objection. Because of Ohio's peculiar position geographically, the railroad vote there is relatively, if not actually, larger than in many other States. It is fact that does not admit of any doubt, because it is too well and too variously attested, that the Adamson law cut a bigger figure in Ohio than almost anywhere else; far more than in Connecticut, where it was expected to be so important that the Republican leaders had gooseflesh over it.

When industrial activity is mentioned, it is objected that there is industrial elsewhere. But Ohio has been transformed by the industrial boom. The State is unrecognizable by any Rip Van Winkle who might come down from the mountains now after a year's sleep. She has become a beehive. New laborers of unknown political antecedents have moved in in large numbers, and they had the Republican leaders completely puzzled. The labor situation, taking it in a larger view, has wrought a transformation in the Ohio viewpoint on public questions.

This, however, is only the beginning. The rural districts usually give 70,000 Republican plurality, but this year they failed the Republicans. The farmers were for Wilson. Agricultural prosperity had done its work. A month before election hogs were 12 cents and wheat was $1.54, and the farmers were enjoying a prosperity they had not known for a long time. They were strongly for the maintenance of peace, and when President Wilson made his speech intimating that peace might not be maintained under a Republican Administration the effect on the farmers was tremendous. No speech or document of the whole campaign produced such an effect in Ohio, though here it passed almost unnoticed.

The last Republican chance was with the business men, but the business men of Ohio were lukewarm to Republican appeals. It was the general report from Ohio that business men there would not get interested in politics, and all the Republican attempts to inflame them fell on unresponsive ears. The Republican "literature" went begging, and the county organizations could not be spurred into interesting themselves in mass meetings, even when speakers "with national reputations" were promised.

It was prosperity that brought about Ohio's astounding reversal; the prosperity of the farmers, manufacturers and laborers, with the Adamson bill as a clincher for the last named. The prosperity of the farmer and the fear of war made him vote for Wilson, while the prosperity of the Republican business men disinclined him toward politics, and especially toward "a change," however he might mechanically keep up his party regularity. Two years before Ohio had elected Governor Willis and sent Harding to the Senate, and her Democratic aberration in electing and re-electing Governor Harmon seemed to have been a mere accident. Perhaps it was an aberration, but her vote for Wilson this year was not. She astounded the nation just as Maine did when she reversed herself and went Democratic in 1910, but for reasons as good to her as were Maine's to that state.—New York Times.
